Money, Sex Lure Men Into Spying

Everyone knows what a traitor is but few people know what brings a man to treachery.

In August, 1963, Allen W.

Dulles, former head of the CIA, said there have been more important defectors in the Communist world in the past ten years than in the West. He said that the greatest damage to the West grew out of the treachery of British atomic scientist Klaus Fuchs, in the late 1940's.

There have been, however, far too many traitors in the free world. Some have been discovered only recently.

It now appears that the free world has erred in not imposing the death sentence on its own citizens who have been proved guilty.

The Free World has also been too permissive in overlooking lapses of moral conduct which give grounds for blackmail.

Dulles has said that greed for money is usually the cause of treachery. Blackmail of sexual deviates is also a weapon used by foreign nations to subvert free world citizens.

IT IS possible that Army

Sergeant Jack Edward Dunlap (who committed suicide in July) was the most damaging traitor in the history of the United States.

While on duty at the National Security Agency, at Fort Meade near Washington, he passed top secret information to the Soviets. Americans will wonder if he had access to our secret codes and ciphers, and if he had any knowledge of whether or not we have been able to crack Russian codes.

It has been reported that he received at least $60,000 in two years. Many people knew that he did not live with his wife and children, and that he was dissipated and extravagant. Nothing was done.

In England, the Denning report on the Profumo case points out that Dr. Stephen Ward (also a suicide) was an active Communist sympathizer for many years. Everyone knew it. Yet Profumo and other prominent persons associated with him and the young women of his coterie.

Lord Denning reported that the Soviet naval attaché, Captain Ivanov, was practicing new espionage tactics not only in the hope of obtaining secret information but to discredit men in public life, to make security services seem incompetent, and to break the trust of citizens. Lord Denning believed these tactics were also to divide the United Kingdom and the United States by weakening confidence in British integrity and morality. Three Englishmen: Burgess (who died recently in Russia), McLean and Philby also weakened the confidence of British subjects and their allies.

ALL THREE men were stationed in Washington at one period a number of years ago. The moral conduct of two was suspected. All were known to have had Communist leanings since their university days in Britain. The British government did nothing about it then on the theory that "old school tie" men could never be traitors.

In Germany, the recent revelation of German traitors has been too little publicized. Some of these were double agents working both for the free world and the Russians. Greed was their incentive. Some of the traitors had been in Hitler's secret police. One lived in unusually affluent style.

It is amazing that the United States, Germany and the other allies trusted them.

Colonel Penkovsky, of Russia, was executed for his traitorous espionage. He did receive money but he may have had some ideological motivation also. The United States public has not been told why he was so important but he had close contacts with high-ranking Soviet army officers and scientists. He was a deputy head of the foreign department of the State Committee for the Coordination of Scientific Research. He is believed to have been a double agent.

THERE HAS been a dispute as to whether the British acted foolishly in disclosing the identity of another Russian traitor, the master spy, A. Dolmynsk, who lived in the United States for a year. He wished to have asylum in Britain but may now wish to return to the United States.

Recently a Swedish Colonel Wennerstrom confessed that he was a paid Soviet spy for fifteen years. For five years of that time, he was stationed in Washington, where he was well known. He passed vital United States intelligence information to the Russians.

An Ambassador of a free world nation recently told this writer that every country has some traitors. He agreed with Dulles that money is a prime motivation.
